The rise in per-capita anthropogenic metal discharge and soil acidification has caused arsenic (As) enrichment in many areas of the world, resulting in As accumulation in the soils and waters. Microalgae have the capacity to bioconcentrate high As concentrations and may serve as the first step in As bioremediation efforts. As resistance in marine microalgae is of both ecological and environmental significance. Microalgae with an As-resistant phenotype remain to be elucidated. Here, we examined three As-resistant strains of marine Prochlorococcus isolated from diverse locations around the world, including a high As site, an As-impaired zone in the Southern Ocean, and an As-impoverished region of Lake Huron. All three isolates exhibited the universal As-tolerant phenotype based on [As(V)] immobilization and [As(III)] detoxification, but they differed in their responsiveness to organic phosphate. The two most resistant strains, MIT93 d0c515b9f4
