The team worked with Intel from the start to make this technology a reality, with a mixture of academic, applied and engineering disciplines that were applied to create a highly accurate, real-time motion capture system. The system allowed us to create an authentic and responsive off-ball behaviour engine that we tested against 22 elite footballers to demonstrate that players perform their actions as we originally intended. "The new HyperMotion Technology increases the speed, responsiveness and variety of gameplay, but still gives players a fresh and satisfyingly authentic on-the-ball experience," said Marco Guenzatti, Senior Producer, FIFA. "It makes the ball feel quicker and more responsive to the skills and movement of the players, which translates on the pitch into a more entertaining match." "This powerful new technology is a thrilling addition to FIFA," said Matt Kirch, vice president of business development, Intel. "Because the new physics engine is driven by motion capture data, it reacts automatically to the actions of the players. When a defender makes a tackle, the physics engine reacts differently on the fly, quickly calculating the reaction of the football, for example, or the trajectory of the bounce." The physics engine of FIFA 22 will be announced at a later date. You can already experience the first gameplay bits of FIFA 22, including the new player animations, through the FIFA Interactive World Cup, which can be viewed here.
