Development of the first commercial AutoCAD began in 1974. Ray Ozzie, AutoCAD's general manager, said the application was inspired by a user, in his words, "who wanted to move the computer from being a tool to his manager". In 1982, after the release of AutoCAD, Autodesk was approached by Stanford University, which wanted a CAD program that allowed students to prepare 3D models. The university's 3D CAD program was named CAD-X. This gave AutoCAD its X. Top of Page The AutoCAD trademark dates back to July 1986. The full company name was changed from Autodesk, Inc. to Autodesk, Inc. in October 1986. In November 1986, a Canadian division was created to develop CAD products for the North American market. In September 1987, Autodesk moved its U.S. headquarters from San Francisco to San Diego. In November 1991, Autodesk and its subsidiary, Dwyer, Inc., were acquired by the August Krantz and Sons Group, a U.K.-based construction products company. Krantz had acquired the licensing and CAD software assets of Autodesk, Inc. in September 1989 for about $44 million. Autodesk was incorporated in January 1993. In 1995, Autodesk changed its company name to Autodesk, Inc. Autodesk's first products were a CADD system and an engineering and architectural drafting system. Both were released in 1985. In 1987, Autodesk released a version for mechanical engineering. The first versions of AutoCAD had the capacity to use a graphics-processing unit (GPU) and were considered the first true CAD systems. This capability made them useful for real-time rendering. AutoCAD launched with a 500-point limit, but could be expanded to 4000 points. On June 11, 1997, Autodesk announced the acquisition of Trimble Navigation, Inc. for about $2.1 billion. According to Autodesk, Trimble Navigation's R&D team worked on the latest updates of AutoCAD, AutoCAD LT, and Plant 3D. The Trimble division was renamed Autodesk Navisworks. Trimble Navisworks was also used by many of its competitors as it added a number of advanced features for mechanical engineering. When it came out last month, I was too busy reading it to write to you. I would love to send you a gift of sushi but don't want to risk being swindled. My husband and I have a thing for Sherlock Holmes. We love the mysteries, the fact that they are unsolved, and the fact that he got away with murder. I also love the books, as well as the TV shows. So when I saw that you were going to be in Vancouver, I knew I had to send you a gift. This was going to be the first time we saw you in person. But it wasn't. A few weeks ago, I received an email from a man I'd never met.
