already. Overexpression of the ZAP-70 protein tyrosine kinase impairs T-cell function in a mouse model of accelerated lupus. The T-cell-specific ZAP-70 protein tyrosine kinase is a cytoplasmic regulator of T-cell signaling, and gain-of-function mutations in ZAP-70 are associated with human autoimmune diseases. We investigated the impact of ZAP-70 overexpression on murine T-cell function and the development of murine lupus, an autoimmune disease characterized by autoreactive T cells. Transgenic mice that overexpress wild-type human ZAP-70 driven by the mouse CD2 promoter (ZAP-70Tg) had an increase in CD4(+) ZAP-70(+) T cells and spontaneous autoimmune T-cell activation. ZAP-70 overexpression resulted in augmented T-cell proliferation, Th1 differentiation, and production of IFN-gamma and TNF-alpha in the absence of IL-12 but did not affect naive T-cell activation or their migration to inflammatory sites. The increased T-cell activation in the transgenic mice was associated with expanded populations of splenic DC. Furthermore, ZAP-70Tg mice had more severe lupus-like pathology in the kidney and spleen, showed increased autoimmune T-cell activation in the kidney, and had reduced survival compared with control mice. The data from this study provide the first in vivo evidence that ZAP-70 plays a crucial role in normal T-cell function and in regulating T-cell activation, suggesting that altered expression of this protein tyrosine kinase may be associated with autoimmunity.
