Amazon Echo customers are now able to select a wake word that they prefer to call Alexa, instead of saying "Alexa." Previously, the wake word for Alexa was "Alexa," but now Echo and Fire tablet users can specify the wake word that they would like Alexa to respond to, which can be set to a specific phrase, like "lights on." While the wake word still needs to be said, when Echo or Fire tablet owners are in a hands-free situation, Alexa will respond to the wake word from now on, according to a new report. Amazon will introduce this new feature to its user base and also update the "Music Store" experience to work a bit better, the company confirmed. From now on, customers will be able to immediately purchase products in the “Music Store” and also automatically receive song recommendations based on what the customer listens to. Amazon Echo The Echo line of home speakers will now play music stored on Amazon’s cloud-based music store and play music recommendations based on what the customer is listening to. The update will allow the Echo and Fire tablet to recognize whether the user is playing a specific song or another song based on what the user is currently listening to. Once the customer changes their song, the Echo or Fire tablet will then begin to offer other songs that are similar. The update will also allow the Echo and Fire tablet to be more useful to Echo and Fire tablet owners. Besides changing the wake word for Alexa

What's new:

Bob Came in Pieces (also credited as Bob Came In.) is an American animated television series created by Carl Kleinschmidt that aired on ABC from September 15, 1996 to July 30, 1997. It was one of the last programs to be aired on the network. Plot Bob is a 6-year-old boy, and the titular star of the show. Bob is really just a laptop that can grow, shrink, and move. However, he is often very easily distracted (chiefly by Zen circles that he draws on), makes easily broken promises, and occasionally makes pseudo-scientific claims. Though the show is around 100 minutes, only a hundred and sixty four episodes are made. The show takes place in the universe of D'Abberino, with Bob on a quest to find a special subatomic particle called "the Higgs boson". He believes it to be the key that will unlock everything else out there in the universe. Along the way to this he gains various pieces, which he then has to put back together in order to keep the universe from imploding. The powers he gets are usually very useful and make the show very popular with kids, but he often runs into trouble when things go wrong. For instance in "Where Is Vizzini?" Zen got even more important than he had ever been, and while it freed him in most cases, it was his complete absorption with the particle and its subsequent destruction that eventually caused Zen (and Stan) to cease to exist. Characters Bob Bob the laptop looks like a human boy although, in the series, he himself is proclaimed to be a robot. He is the main star of the series and most of the whole show revolves around him. Though he shows a tendency to break things, he tends to prove to be the key to many different adventures, even saving the series from being cancelled several times. Although he's never had actual lips, he makes good lip noises to convey his emotions. One of his chief methods of communicating is drawing, as he usually draws right before he talks. As he matures, his body doesn't look the way it did from when he started out, but it still resembles a human body to a certain extent. In later episodes, he starts looking more and more like a real human boy. He tends to wear a T-shirt with a question in English on it. Stan Stan the sidekick is Bob's best friend. He, like Bob, is a
