I'm not too deep in SoC, but I feel like the current situation is something like this: SoC guys and SoC enthusiasts can figure out how to design SoC blocks without consulting non-SoC engineers (who are nevertheless concerned with the SoC blocks). I don't know what they do, but I know the result. SoC enthusiasts and SoC designers occasionally go to implement SoC-related non-SoC uses in the non-SoC block and start from scratch. These features go through the community and will eventually reach the SoC. Designing in the "not-SoC" block will eventually be stopped. The work is done by a small community in the community. > >The only way to learn from this mistake is to publish the design at the last moment. > > I think you misunderstanded. >
