The effects of the nondepolarizing blocker of calcium entry, nifedipine, and of the blocker of cholinergic pathways, atropine, on the diuresis induced by hypotension were evaluated. Unanesthetized rats were subjected to hypotension by arterial blood withdrawal to a mean arterial pressure (MAP) of 50, 60, and 70 mmHg for 6 h. MAP was kept constant at the experimental end-point by infusion of Ringer solution supplemented with phenoxybenzamine. Nifedipine (5 mg/kg, i.v.)

or atropine (30 mg/kg, i.v.) were injected at the beginning of the last hour of hypotension. The diuresis was evaluated by measuring the change in diuresis over time in each experimental group, and was corrected for e79caf774b
