Bahrain International Circuit, also known as the Sakhir International Circuit, is an ultra-modern track that hosts some of the biggest motorsport competitions. It is known for the series of short straights and slow bends that make up its total length of 5.412km, which put the emphasis on precision when entering the bends and changes of pace rather than pure speed. That’s about all I can say about this part of the world; because I didn’t have the chance to visit it myself, I can only base my opinion on the impressions I got from what I’ve seen from the movies and the videos I’ve watched and read online. So, what can you expect about the Bahrain International Circuit? 1. A big variety of scenery: The first thing you’ll notice about the Bahrain International Circuit is the buildings. In the whole expanse of the circuit there are three grandstands and seven hotels and sports centres, but the most eye-catching feature of the circuit is probably its track. The track is the birthplace of the race series and was built in 1980. It is the first track of the kind in the region and even if it was for more than 30 years old, its shape and speed still stay very close to its track record – one of the fastest tracks in the world, with an average speed of 244 kph. In 2013, they completed construction of the public road section that will be used to transport the cars for the second stage of the Bahrain Formula One Team Championship, that means the circuit can be used by cars from all over the world. 2. Street Races: The race that put the Bahrain International Circuit on the map was the 1992 Barcelona Street Race. It was a competition between street racing teams and teams from Formula 1. The race was the only in history that gained sponsorship. Because of this, it is known as The Battle of the Seas. In 1993, it was the first race of the Formula 3 Challenge. It was decided by the officials of the international association of motor racing as the most “interesting” race in the world. 3. Evo (the only tour) BahaExpo is the brand of BMW Motorsport, which is responsible for all the activities in conjunction with the Bahrain International Circuit. When visiting the circuit, you’ll get to enjoy different events in which you can participate. You can watch some motors

Wages go up for low-income workers, boosting consumer spending in Trump’s first budget By Gene Roth, Pew Charitable Trusts December 6, 2016 - 6:54pm People preparing to cross the border from Guatemala in Tapachula, Mexico, June 27, 2017. Along with Trump’s tax proposal, his budget would include billions in cuts to the U.S. Agency for International Development. (Tomas Bravo / AP) In a significant break from past administrations, the Trump administration’s first budget proposal calls for increasing wages for low-income Americans. Here’s a breakdown of what you need to know about what to expect from the first budget proposal from President Trump’s administration: WHAT MAKES THIS YEAR DIFFERENT One of the most notable changes in the proposed budget is a proposal to boost wages for low- and middle-income workers. The plan would increase from 3 to 6 percent the amount of taxes workers pay to fund Social Security and the Earned Income Tax Credit, and it would adjust tax rates for workers to keep them closer to where they were during the late 1990s. One of the primary arguments for both tax and wage policies is that they boost spending. Research and advocacy groups have long found that the effects of a tax increase for individuals are about three times as large as the effects of the same tax increase for employers. WHAT’S NOT INCLUDED IN THE PROPOSED BUDGET Some economists have estimated the cost of those increased wages for people on a low income, but this is the first budget proposal from the Trump administration and it doesn’t detail how much the plan would cost, nor who would pay for it. One of the goals of the budget is to shift away from depending on the federal government to finance health care. Trump’s budget would

A box pops out of nowhere and must be moved around the level. There are doors at the end of the room, that open. Each door can only be opened with the correct item from the room, and when there is only one item remaining the box disappears, until it is moved somewhere else. At that point it will pop back out again. The moment it appears it is time for the box to be moved, and now you must choose a way to do this, by switching to a specific character and move the box to the appropriate location, the box will show up again, you must now choose a new way to do this and the game continues. A clever player will find ways to take advantage of these items, and the situation on the screen, but the more moves it takes to win, the more it will tax your mind. Each character has their own set of moves, so finding them and understanding what they do is key to winning. If it is not moved, a timer will start to countdown, counting down to when the storage unit doors will be unlocked. The player is given a choice of what they want to do at that time. By finishing the task, they can get the doors unlocked, and get out of there, but with an increased chance of the guard waking up, or coming back, so not only is it a race to get out of the depot, but a race against the clock as well. The challenge is, that the timer to the last lock is also counting down, and as you make your way out of the depot, you must deal with the situation, or run out of time, and be back in jail! What's new in Move That Box!:

I saw this photo at Chad’s last month and asked Chad to send it to me, and told him it reminded me of our trailer days. But he was the one who sent this one to me – the photo is from 2003, and of my current cargo which is some of my research articles. So Chad - it’s like you were showing me your front porch, and I was putting your baby shoes on your porch! ? As usual with Chad, you knew he would find something amazing! Literally! What you may not know is that Chad worked really hard when we first began to lose everything at the end of 2009. He wasn’t exactly working hard, but he was shuffling paper like crazy, and sewing folders and creating expository documents. But he also began putting pencil to paper to sketch his green essay on the Cern project. By March 2, we had moved everything, and the next day he began furiously working on his last packet, his Cern project, entitled “Cern and SPACE.” He had been working on it since April 2009. I remember when he started, he was saying, “No, I don’t even understand how it will ever work.” But within less than three months of working on it, it was completed. It was by far the best project he’d ever tackled. It was a real achievement. Chad is one of those extraordinary people who has the capacity to impose the maximum amount of effort on the minimum amount of result. If I told you that Chad was the absolute opposite, what he is capable of accomplishing with almost no effort would either astonish or frighten you. His special genius has to do with the way he never asks the hard questions, whether they are simple or complex. Of course, with him there are a lot of things he can’t help at all. I once asked him, “How do you always know what to do?” He thought for a minute, then said, “I’m not sure I do!” Chad’s dedication to finding the truth always reminds me of a conversation my brother Joe and I once had about food trucks. Joe asked Chad how his food truck went after losing everything on the last September, and he replied, “It was the best money I ever spent,” which piqued our curiosity. “If the food
