- Organizers Clash Over Wiring To understand the challenges facing the activist protesting the announcement of the re-built Venus Hellas by the French musical instruments manufacturer, look no further than the National Museum of Contemporary Art in Athens. One of the premier contemporary art museums in the world, it also houses a dedicated site to the artist Yia Souli, a sculptor whose work focuses on Greek and Cypriot heritage (his piece for the Museum, Rebirth, for example, is an elaborate reconstruction of a statuette found in Cyprus in the 1980s that Sifis claims is dedicated to Aphrodite, and is likely that of the piece on display). As such, the museum has become both a cultural hub for the city and home to Sifis' own work. When I visited the museum, an impromptu concert was being held by a group of musicians. The audience included members of the press and general public as well as the organizers of the protest action. As these musicians were practicing, members of the activist group took a break from the demonstration about a block away and waited on a corner for the performance to start. The public left to go home, the press left the concert to interview some of the organizers, and the musicians finished their song and went back on stage to redouble their practice. Afterwards, the organizers and one of the artists introduced themselves to me and to the journalist from the museum. As we chatted with the artists about their protest, one of them, standing idly in the intersection with his guitar case nearby, asked me a pointed question. “So, are you going to help us with this?” I shared that, while an outsider and a complete stranger, I was going to join the demonstration, because it didn’t just seem to be about music and performance art, it was about protesting the history of the instrument itself. He replied that many students and artists had been working on it for years, talking to musicians throughout Greece, plus government officials and the Aristotelian University. He added that we would be asked to leave if the police searched the location, so I should make sure to keep everything confidential, because it was going to be a public protest and we could risk the entire event being shut down. “You said everything,” I replied. “Yes,” he said, “but I also said we are ready for it. We have the list of

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a process for coating a magnetostrictive material.

2. Description of the Prior Art Magnets having small magnetic bodies, such as ferrites, bonded to their surface have been used in various types of articles. Examples of such magnets are rotary-driving magnets used in a magnetic rotary seal in order to prevent fluid or fluid mixture from leaking out or entering from the sealing part when the rotary shaft in the seal is rotated. In such applications, it is required that the coating material, which is used for bonding the magnet to its substrate, has a low material permeability. On the other hand, the magnet is required to be well bonded to the substrate so as to be prevented from falling off, and a sufficient mechanical strength to resist the impacts and vibration of the rotating element is demanded. Also, a good barrier property and corrosion resistance of the coating material are required. Further, high adhesiveness of the coating material is required. To satisfy these requirements, it is desirable that the bonded magnet, which is produced by a so-called powder coating process, has a low permeability, a high bonding strength, a good barrier property and a high chemical stability. Although the magnet coated by the conventional powder coating process has the above-mentioned properties at the early stage of use
