With CrackPaintball, at the risk of creating a paradox, is a sport that is far too young to have reached its full potential. The teeming number of brightly colored, ingeniously designed sports markers, all fired by high pressure nitrogen, is just beginning to yield to the laws of avian geometry. In order to assemble a survey of the most notable developments and trends in contemporary paintball manufacture, I decided to hold my fire on an analysis of the sport itself and begin with a look at the equipment. Much of the early evolution of the sport was very closely tied to the technical requirements of the military. While the game is now many times larger than it was in the early 1980s, much of the equipment is in the same configuration as the blaster pistols first issued to American soldiers in Korea. A.40 caliber, semi-auto-operated pistol (with a working piston, in a gas system) fires standard paintball rounds, but the newer marker has a 20 round magazine, which is prone to clogging. Some pistols have night sights, some have infrared sights, and some have sights that don't appear to be there at all. The blast-cartridge size, gravity feed system, and method of jetting balls down a tube varies from manufacturer to manufacturer
