US Customs and Border Protection told senators at a hearing Thursday that it is looking at the way the ports of Vancouver, British Columbia, and Laredo, Texas are being used for trade and that officials are considering three options: a pipeline proposal, moving containers around port infrastructure and drones. "Those are the options CBP is looking at right now," DHS Customs and Border Protection's Acting Commissioner

Mark Morgan told lawmakers at a Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee hearing. The administration does not currently have any pipeline infrastructure on the US southern border with Mexico, according to the official. Officials have also considered using US military bases and facilities in Arizona, Texas and South Florida to set up customs checkpoints, but that has been ruled out, the official told CNN.
