The idea of developing a new framework for reconstructing nuclear weapons in the Soviet Union has been floating around in the American defense establishment since the 1980s. The idea is to create a workable, reasonable and safe alternative to the current comprehensive accounting framework, which was put in place by the US Congress in 1986. The framework mandates that each Pentagon component, which includes the Department of Defense, Navy, Air Force, Army, Marine Corps, and intelligence community must ensure that "each weapon-system, program, or activity used or needed for the nuclear enterprise, whether owned by the US Government, an allied or partner nation, or an international organization, is accounted for separately." The idea of developing a new framework for reconstructing nuclear weapons in the Soviet Union has been floating around in the American defense establishment since the 1980s. The idea is to create a workable, reasonable and safe alternative to the current comprehensive accounting framework, which was put in place by the US Congress in 1986. In fact, the idea gained some prominence in the mid- to late 1980s. But while being developed, the idea was dismissed as irrelevant because the ABM systems were not in operation. "For two decades now, the idea of developing the fissile material accounting framework has been dismissed as being irrelevant and fraught with all manner of problems," states Dr. John E. Foster, the head of 6d1f23a050
