We attempted to identify the clinicopathologic predictors of pathologically confirmed lymph node metastasis in squamous cell carcinoma of the head and neck (HNSCC) by analyzing the results of a nationwide survey. The data of 1,567 patients with HNSCC from 1998 to 2001 were analyzed. The univariate and multivariate analyses of the factors influencing lymph node metastasis were performed. The overall incidence of lymph node metastasis at surgery was 36.9% (N2a, 13.6%; N2b, 22.5%; and N2c, 1.0%). The risk factors for N2b and N2c in the multivariate analysis were the primary tumor diameter (>4 cm), age (>65 years), and clinical T4 or tonsillar sites. The risk factors for N2a were the primary tumor diameter (>4 cm) and clinical T2. Only 1.2% of patients in the N0 group had positive lymph nodes; however, about 19% of the N1 patients had positive nodes. The factors correlated to lymph node metastasis were examined. The incidence of lymph node metastasis is a useful indicator in
