understand a safer experience for our users. .Effect of repeated exposure to a life-threatening situation on the acquisition and retention of operant learned behavior. In many animals, severe stress has been found to impair the acquisition of learned behavior. In the present study, we examined whether similar effects occur in humans when the stress is of sufficiently severe intensity as to cause trauma. In this study we investigated the effect of repeatedly exposing a group of subjects to a life-threatening situation (rape) on the acquisition and retention of a learned operant behavior (escalator test). The conditions in which the subjects are exposed to the life-threatening situation are intentionally designed to reduce or eliminate the possibility of learning by habituation. When stressed subjects are first exposed to the escalator, they show impaired acquisition, as compared to unstressed subjects. The effect of stress appears to be mediated by a deficit in the ability to acquire a
