I'm trying to work out if using the tmux client to connect to a Linux server and make a session on that server makes sense. I'm running tmux in multiple shells and want to keep all the windows and panes I'm using in those shells in the same session. tmux allows me to do this by launching a separate tmux session in a separate window. What I don't like about this is the tmux client protocol forces a window. It works great for executing a command in a different shell, but I don't want to have to start a window to continue, I want to do that in a single window. I'm just trying to decide if this is actually "easier" than just starting a second shell on my server and then working across both instances. A: You don't need to run a client. A client is only used if you want to share or receive a window (pane) from another host. You can share an open window from one machine to another but there is no way to receive a new session from another machine. A client is not required. The Most Empowering Solution to My Needs As a member of both the EGG (How to Empower Greater Entrepreneurship) and the EGG Entrepreneurship Clubs, I received a free membership to EGG+EC. I was thankful for my investment in the program and this group of women. We discussed our successes and failures while highlighting our successes and failures. We agreed that the more we invested in our futures, and our relationships with one another, the better off we would be. The idea of buying into the concept of trade while bringing value to others, and receiving value from others, was a new and intriguing concept to me. Prior to investing in this new concept, I was a bit envious of EGG+EC because I had been a member of EGG. I found the women in my current mastermind group to be more influential and business savvy than my peers. I always wanted to be that one person who c6a93da74d
