It is possible to follow the whole project online. In this section, we focus on the trajectories and lifestyles of the middle class, and the sort of middle class that we can find in a city such as Poitiers, a working-class city in the province of Vienne. The middle class has certainly changed in recent years. Previously, it was defined by one key feature: a wage at the minimum necessary to provide a decent life, with a pension and health insurance cover. But we have seen a series of middle-class ruptures: we have witnessed a rise in precariousness of employment, in the decline of the traditional waged positions, and in family difficulties. In the current economic situation, middle-class precariousness is combined with a growing insecurity of social rights. It is in this context that we are confronted with two major challenges: the question of the definition of the middle class, and the question of how to conceptualize its vulnerability. Therefore, the first section in the present document, entitled: "the end of the middle class, or the end of the middle class in Poitiers?", aims to reflect on the most innovative and topical ideas around the definition of this concept, whether through theoretical approaches or through empirical approaches. In the second part, "the end of the middle class: the middle class in Poitiers?", we use a qualitative approach to ask what the reality of a middle class in Poitiers is. This section will allow us to highlight the precarious position of the middle class in Poitiers in the current economic and social context. This document is part of a major research project in Poitiers, the CEPIS (Contre la Privation de la France) project, funded by the French National Research Agency (Agence Nationale pour la Recherche). It is carried out in partnership with the CEPIS Action Group (Conseil de l'Action Community de la Socialité) of the City of Poitiers and the University of Poitiers. Tanks and armoured vehicles protected the gates of parliament and government offices as demonstrators marched in central Bangkok on Saturday, a day before the country marked the 21st anniversary of the military coup that ousted an elected government. Hundreds of protesters remain camped in front of the parliament building and in the streets of the city, but the numbers dwindled on Saturday as the temperature hit 36C (97F). Most appeared to be members of the Suthep Songklang party, a rival to the main protest camp which has camped out at the army's main campus for weeks. On Friday night, authorities cleared away a number of protesters who had set fire to and ripped down the posters of the former prime minister, Thaksin Shinawatra, who was toppled by the military in a 2006 coup. Photograph: Stringer/Reuters The protest movement, named "We are all Thais", includes prominent opposition figures and lawyers who have occupied government buildings for four weeks. They say they want to remove the military from politics. A new protest law, which has been fiercely contested by critics and which is only set to be approved this week, will help authorities crack down on those who take part in what are considered illegal acts.
