The name Autodesk is an abbreviation of the Latin word Autor, which means the author. Autodesk was also founded in 1982 by the employees of a tool company, called Computer Product. It was founded by Gary Kildall, who had also founded Digital Research in 1977. In 1984, they made the purchase of a large company named Motif, and in 1985 acquired two computer animation companies. Autodesk was originally a two product company, called Computer Design and Computer Product. In 1984, Gary Kildall created the first version of AutoCAD. Also in 1984, AutoCAD was renamed into a registered trademark. The two product company was renamed to Autodesk in 1986. The two software products were renamed to AutoCAD and CADtools. However, Kildall realized that the company could still earn the name Autodesk, he decided to rename CADtools into AutoCAD. What about using this software to get the "English key" for the next version of Autocad? You need a license, Autocad allows you to check for the next version when it's released, and you're ready to download. Why would anyone be willing to be locked out of the next version of the software? Actually, this would be even more beneficial for the original developers because they could also use this generated key to access the source code and get the latest updates to the program. Maybe they could even contact Autocad to try to get some compensation. Another scenario, maybe this software is commonly used by many piracy groups to generate keys for their friends. This process may generate so many keys that it will bring down the Internet. Maybe they should contact Autocad to let them know of the problem. Perhaps Autocad can give them a credit for all of the keys they have generated or something like that.
