a good way to look at purpose is to separate the brand from the brand owner, but that doesn't mean that businesses don't need purpose or shouldn't strive for it. companies exist to serve a purpose, and their true purpose isn't necessarily about sales or profits. sometimes it's to serve a cause, such as raising awareness or making the world a better place. other times it's simply to make money. successful brands are those that aren't afraid to use their purpose to build loyalty with customers and lure new ones. some believe the brand's purpose is to be the world's most recognizable brand, but that doesn't matter as much as people actually using the brand to address social issues. it's all about what brands do to make a difference and promote social change. if you need a good example of a brand's purpose, look no further than some of the finest brands out there and see how they benefit society in a measurable way. there's the leaders of unilever, who have become the world leader in sustainable living, and pepsi, who know how to create products that may be perfect for life, but also make you feel better about your health. and many brands are leading the way and pioneering new ways to benefit society. home depot is an example of a brand's goal to create value through value. it's committed to the idea that people want to bring more value to the world and want to make the world a better place. branding isn't just about creating a logo, it's about building a unique brand that shows what purpose can do for the world. there's a real purpose behind every brand, but every brand needs to go above and beyond to understand and connect with its audiences.

two directions; first you can focus on the subject and the main message you want to get across, and the second, you have to work through the point of view of the audience and understand their state of mind.
