FS2004 - Captain Sim C-130 Pro V1.1 Expansions Serial Key _HOT_

Captain Sim has done a lot of great things in the past and I suspect their intentions were genuinely good. I also think their intentions were good but they were very misguided on the subject of information and community rights in the overall case. I know both Microsoft and Lockheed Martin have repackaged the free/open source Microsoft Flight Simulator and the more open Source Red Bull Worldings, but this is in their direct revenue streams. No one is entitled to a copy of the product they are developing unless they pay for it or otherwise receive compensation. The question a lot of us are asking is why they chose to restrict how the free community can use Captain Sims aircraft? It is simply a matter of economics and to be fair, they are not the only simulator company to do this. The reason is probably due to the copyright issues when it comes to product identification that have yet to be resolved. In the case of real world flights, using a model or photograph of an aircraft is perfectly legal so long as it doesnt claim outright ownership. Since all of us have seen and/or can create public domain-protected plans, releasing them to the community is actually the most open and legal thing to do, but trying to claim sole ownership over aircraft liveries is definitely not. What they havent done, is try to follow the proper protocols for product identification. Even with Captain Sims own livery creation system, the process is still not clear and we all need to follow directions on how it works. When it comes to creating a livery, you first have to have a valid licence issued by either the manufacturers or the country the aircraft is based. This licence is then used to earn your copyright by validating your design and ensures the work is clear of copyright. At this stage, the licensee can continue to use the design for demonstration purposes for free. However, when it comes to distributing and selling a product, they must have written permission from the manufacturer or another person who has ownership of the original patent.
