directory is an operating system file that contains a directory tree. it contains files and other directories. the directory can be accessed using a directory browser, such as windows explorer or finder. directory browsing can be done by directly clicking on a file or folder, or by using the sidebar in the file system. some directory browsers can be made to sort through the contents of a directory by alphabetical, numerical, or date, and some can be used to navigate a directory structure by selecting a directory or file, and then pressing the up and down keys on the keyboard to move up and down through the directories. if you want to remove all of the files and folders from a directory, you can use the robocopy command. this command will copy the files and folders from one directory to another, and it will also remove the copied items. it will also remove any hidden items. the good news is that since you can't possibly keep up, any progress you do make is a win. if you get cracked via a three-week-old software vulnerability, at least you're more elite than someone who gets cracked via a three-year-old'sploit. (on the other hand, either way you're cracked.) if you don't have the time or the skills to crack passwords then you are probably better to pass a try and do a self-study on how to crack passwords. a good book to start with is cracking passwords. one of the resources on the internet i would recommend as a starting point for your learning on the subject is how to crack passwords. i am trying to bruteforce a username and password to access a remote router with a serial port. i know the username and password, but i can't figure out how to use them. i am looking for a way to "piggyback" off of an existing script or program to try and crack the password.
