The first rule of algorithm cracking is to check possible passwords for completeness. What I do is go through each letter in the password, possibly starting in the middle or end, and see if I have a complete word that I can check if it works. It is no use testing a comma, for example, because it is not a letter. This is my routine. If I get a complete word that works, it is a hit. I then check that word for repetitions, i.e. my code checks each letter in the word separately and if it is the same as the previous character, I have a repeat. I then go through the word and see if it repeats at the end, remembering that because no two words are the same, any two words are easy to test. I check the beginning, middle, and end of the password. After that I try to find a word that is longer than the password and test if it is a hit.
