An aging population and extended health care have greatly increased the number of individuals who will require surgical procedures for conditions that traditionally would have been amenable to nonsurgical therapies. A percutaneous intervention (PCI) is performed to treat conditions such as a blocked or narrowed coronary artery, a ventricular aneurysm, or a patent foramen ovale (PFO) by positioning one or more devices within the affected vessel. The tools and procedures for PCI continue to evolve as the development of drug-eluting stents improves patient outcomes. A major factor that dictates the difficulty and success of a PCI is the ability to accurately navigate a catheter through tortuous or branching vessel anatomy. Navigation involves direct visualization, advancement of a catheter distal to the desired location, and capturing the location with an image sensor. However, one challenge with navigation is achieving optimal visualization with a catheter tip and/or any catheter track on a luminal surface of a patient's vessel that would be in the field of view of the image sensor. One significant challenge is that the catheter track or path is typically curved or tortuous which leads to many difficulties such as poor visualization, imprecise placement of a catheter tip relative to the luminal surface, etc.

The relationships among players' and coaches' satisfaction, motivation and team performance are distinctively different for women compared with men. The study investigated the relationship between player- and coach-satisfaction with motivation and team performance for men and women in three different age groups. A total of 201 men and women (including juniors and seniors) participated in the study. A questionnaire was used to assess four constructs (player satisfaction, coach satisfaction, motivation, and team performance). Differences between
