The structure of karate katas can be as complex as the katas themselves. A kata is a set of movements that are learned and performed as part of a training process. In karate, these are part of the foundational set of katas known as Senmon katas. With more than 80 different katas, there is an infinite number of variations on the basic movements of the Senmon katas. In addition, the movements within a kata are repeated multiple times in a set of sparring matches. Each kata and kata variation teaches you a different way to strike a given technique. As a result, the structure of a kata is incredibly important for memorization and execution of techniques. One kata can have as many as fifteen different movements in it. All the katas and their variations work together to form a complete system of striking. A kata can be broken down into the following components: kata (a set of movements), kihon (foundation, or first principles of the kata), kumite (sparring), and kata kumite (sparring with the kata). As a result, the structure of a kata is incredibly important for
