Quality of life in a cohort of stroke patients with long-term follow-up: patients' perceptions of their day-to-day lives. At long-term follow-up, patients may experience a degree of psychological distress that may be apparent and interferes with their recovery. To investigate the level of psychological distress in a cohort of stroke patients with long-term follow-up. A cohort of stroke patients with long-term follow-up was recruited for a longitudinal quality of life study. Psychological symptoms were assessed by means of self-report questionnaires, the Hospital Anxiety and Depression Scale (HADS) and the Satisfaction with Life Scale (SWLS). The Mental Health Inventory (MHI) was used to assess the impact of psychological symptoms on day-to-day functioning. A total of 48 patients were recruited and followed for a period of 24 months. Psychological symptoms were identified in 41 patients, the most common symptom being depression (26 patients). A proportion of these patients (10 patients) had significant symptoms of depression with a mean depression score of 8 (out of a maximum score of 21). The level of psychological distress was high and psychological symptoms had a significant impact on day-to-day functioning. Furthermore, in this cohort, women experienced more depression than men and older patients had more psychological symptoms than younger patients. Psychological symptoms are a frequent cause of distress in a cohort of stroke patients at 24 months after stroke. of women, even though there is no way for them to prove that. Still, as a percentage of population, they do outnumber the male population. They're also a lot better about taking care of their children. Look at the appalling situation in India. A recent survey found that nearly half of all women in that country (48%) have experienced sexual violence of some kind. Another 24 percent of women have been victims of rape. (I might have mentioned before that India has the world's most draconian rape laws. I'll leave that detail to your imagination.) Here's a breakdown of the percentages of women and men in 79a2804d6b
