surgery. Inhalation anaesthesia with halothane, enflurane and diethyl ether is described for outpatient day surgery. The anaesthesia is administered in a 15-20-min period using a respiratory-triggered system. Halothane may be used by itself or combined with ether. The most suitable concentration of halothane (1 to 1.5 per cent) is determined for each patient. Minimum concentration of halothane required for induction (1 to 2 per cent) is within the recommended clinical limit of 0.7 to 2.0 per cent. The use of halothane at low concentrations may have advantages during surgery because of less depression of respiratory function than with other anaesthetics.Q: Are there any known issues regarding cloning node.js instances? I have been using the following code for cloning node.js servers: var

```javascript
fs = require('fs'); var path = require('path'); var net = require('net'); var SockIo = require('sock-io'); var local = require('local-server'); var port = local.get('port'); var
host = local.get('host');
fs.exists('new-serv', function (err, exists) { if (err) return console.error(err); if (exists) { console.log('Local server already exists!'); return; } var serv = new net.Server();
serv.listen(port, host); var sock = SockIo.create(serv, {
```

reconnect: true });
sock.on('connection',
function (c) {
console.log(c.address +'connected'); var fstream = fs.createReadStream('newserv/index.js');
c.pipe(fstream); }); }); As you can see, I am first checking for the file 'newserv' in the same directory
where the main script resides. If the file exists, I am sending the contents of
'index.js' and trying to pipe the content back to the node instance, which I have already started. The following is the content of the 'index.js' file which I am trying to pipe back to the node instance: var net = require('net'); var io = net.createConnection(
