Academic Ethics and the Internet: A large number of students today, if not most, have access to the internet. In the past this did not have to be the case. People would have to go to great lengths just to have access to a computer. Now that computer ownership is so common, people are expecting more from the services they receive. The difference between the expectations for services and actual services provided, is what this course will be dealing with. Expected Outcomes: After completing this course, you will be able to: - Use academic resources responsibly. - Recognize Internet resources as a tool, and not as a replacement for academic resources. - Demonstrate the responsibility that is expected in your use of the Internet. - Demonstrate the commitment to, and responsibility to, academic ethics. - Recognize the Internet as a place of interaction, not a place of discovery or information gathering. - Use the Internet to conduct information research in support of classroom assignments, rather than as a replacement for it.
