You can begin by selecting the 'File Type', referring to the format for the output picture; you can choose between JPEG, PNG, BMP and TIFF, whichever best fulfills your needs. Similarly, you can set a certain save path for all your files. The 'Take Screenshot' section enables you to opt between manual and automatic running, the former allowing you to capture a picture using the 'Print Scr' button on your keyboard (set by default, so you do not get to decide which key to use), while the latter lets you grab images at a user-defined interval, by specifying the number of milliseconds between each take. The same key (Print Scr) is the trigger, whereas in order to stop Screenshot Ultra, you can press F12. From the 'Screen Region' area, you can select to capture the 'Full Screen', the 'Active Window' or a 'Custom Region' that you can define using your mouse cursor, with the option of previewing the screenshot before saving it to your PC.
