dependencies Description: videowatch is a program that helps you protect your computer from getting crazy from time to time. iIt instantly turns off your computer after a designated amount of time when you have been inactive. It also has a complete time/date log, allowing you to see what times your computer has been on for the past 30 days, and what programs it has been running. videowatch supports all of the most popular video playback programs like Windows Media Player, QuickTime, and VLC. Description: It was taken from the cnet forums: I was trying to figure out how to do this on XP without using the API, and I think I've succeeded. It's not pretty, and the MSVC++ can be a pain, but it works for me and it works well. It takes video from a specified directory (or, if you want to give a file path, "files:\directory\filename.avi"), and displays it in a window that will sit there until you press a hotkey. After that, it will play a video on it's own, and stop when it's done. If it has a file that it can't handle, it just sits there. If it's playing a video and gets called to a file, it just starts playing again. You can make it play through as many times as you want, and it takes just a bit of tweaking. (Note that it uses DShow to do the DirectX rendering, so it won't work on non-Windows machines, but it's pretty easy to get it to work, so you should be able to fix that up if you want. It's easier to code it up, but there's a small nugget in the DShow documentation, and a bit of research, which can get you started. #include #include #include #include #include
