Insulin-like growth factor I (IGF-I) is a major mediator of growth hormone (GH)-induced longitudinal growth. The main source of circulating IGF-I is liver, but inactivating mutations of the IGF-I gene cause IGF-I deficiency. In this review, the regulation of liver IGF-I expression is discussed, and the development of new ways of treating IGF-I deficiency is highlighted. Promising results have been obtained in rat models of craniosynostosis with all-trans retinoic acid (RA), a derivative of vitamin A. Preliminary results in children with IGF-I deficiency indicate that treatment with a tyrosine kinase inhibitor, to which hepatic IGF-I expression has been shown to be sensitive, will restore growth. The first promising results are shown in two children with X-linked GHD and IGF-I deficiency. Finally, the effects of
