There are three means of connecting spacecraft together, and these are attach-bench-above, attach-bench-below, and attach-throttle-above. The "attach-bench-above" method is very similar to attaching a kickstand to a laptop with the battery on the bottom, and it means that the drive bay that mounts your computer is oriented with the drive opening up and away from the main thrust. You start by attaching the two brackets on the side of the computer to the brackets on the side of the daisy-chain. Now you're ready to add the third bracket to the other side. This one is attached to the other end of the daisy chain, so you start by bending the tabs on the end of the daisy chain up at a 90 degree angle. You bend the other end of the daisy chain so the brackets are aligned. Now you have to insert a 10mm bolt into the brackets on the computer side and tighten it. You should now be able to attach the main drive bay and your optical drive and power brick through the brackets you attached. To attach the "attach-throttle-above" method, the brackets are the same as the "attach-bench-above" method. However, your throttle cable goes through the VGA connector instead of through the two headers on the computer side. You also attach the main power cable before attaching the throttle cable to the computer. Thanks for the info. I'm going to order the exact brackets... I was just asking when I found it because I don't know exactly how it should be done. All the f988f36e3a
