While it was never a straightforward money-spinner, newspapers and TV channels have been able to present themselves as indispensable to national and global democracy. But as the sharing of stories by journalists and citizens has become increasingly common online, so has that online presence been perceived as a threat. When the Guardian announced that it was banning comments and the Financial Times altered its commenting policy, both in the UK, they were acting on the belief that comments online were undermining the content-creation model that these newspapers thrive on. Now many commentators are reporting a change of heart. There are those who oppose all comments, arguing that comments are frivolous and damaging. I'm not convinced. I do however understand the anxieties of those who believe that the message they are putting out is only going to be read and heard by those who are already going to share their opinion. Two things are clear. Comments are an incredibly cheap and convenient way to spread information and they are hugely important for research and analysis. I have said many times over the years that comments have to be recognised as a social norm, like littering, voting and standing in queues. If we are going to bring comments into the mainstream, we need to make them work for everyone. Recent research conducted by the American magazine Media Life has shown that comments have a huge effect on the sites they appear on. Media Life's Mark Kelly and Jodi Inkelas have analysed data on 15,000 users who commented on The Atlantic's blogs, asking if any relationship could be found between the readership of a blog and the number of comments it received. The authors found that blogs with an average of 100 comments per day received 75,000 unique visitors; blogs with an average of 1,000 comments per day received 275,000 unique visitors. The results were the same across nearly every topic, but Kelly explains that his research, which was paid for by The Atlantic, has not examined the quality of the comments,
