So I am building a function for a web application, where I have to check if the user is authorized to view a certain area in the system. Now what I have is the following function: //user is given a token. The token needs to be verified func hasAccessToView(userID: String, token: String) -> Bool { //Find if the token is valid let verificationResult = isTokenValid(token, userID) //Check if the user is authorized let isAdmin = isAdminUser(userID) let isLockedOut = isLockedOutUser(userID) return isAdmin &&!isLockedOut && verificationResult &&!isTokenExpired(token, userID) } isAdminUser is another function that checks if the user is a super user func isAdminUser(userID: String) -> Bool { return userID == "a@a.com" } So here is what I can say. The user is given a token to verify access to an area. The token has been verified and I use that in order to check if the user is admin or locked out. I can also say that the user is not a super user and that I checked that with a different function, isLockedOutUser. So basically, what I am saying here is that I need to use many functions to check things and if I can do this better in a more optimized way and maybe it is, I would really appreciate the help. I have the option to store a lot of constants and functions that have no logic inside them and just return true or false. However this seems like a really bad practice, as you could easily write a large function that does almost nothing but is a long and tedious work. So I have the following question. Am I doing this right, or do I have to rethink everything and create the functions that do the main logic and get rid of the rest
