Kabul's new mayor threw his support behind a controversial reform to the country's election system, allowing candidates to stand for multiple offices simultaneously in a bid to attract more votes. Ali Jalali, who assumed the job on October 30, appeared on state television on Sunday, saying he supported the reform because he wanted "maximum people's participation". "While running my campaign, I never had this option, but now people will vote for whoever they want," Jalali said. Fellow Kabul politician and independent candidate for parliament, Ahmad Fahim, has opposed the law, saving it violates the constitution. The reforms come amid rising concern that Taliban insurgents will use the elections to try to extend their power in the capital and make gains in the country as a whole. The elections "will have unintended consequences", warned Fahim, adding that if they are not prepared "the 2014 elections will only give a green light to the Taliban". The parliamentary candidate said he had not yet gone through the law but had "no doubt" that the election commission in charge of the vote would now receive more government funds and the government would be able to control the composition of the election commission. "There will be no independent monitoring by the international community," he said. A spokesman for the Afghanistan Independent Human Rights Commission, Amanullah Amiri, echoed Fahim's concerns. "We have raised these concerns of the election commission's unreliability with the US government," he said, adding that "voting is not only for Afghans, but also for the world". The Taliban has not commented on the bill, but
