I have a.m file in which I am using a routine. The routine is required to be a "regular" Matlab routine, i.e., one that accepts command arguments. The routine uses Paraview interface for it's operations. And I would like to use the.m file in Paraview. In the Paraview manual I have been able to find this statement. Using ParaView's standardized interface, you write your own callable objects that encapsulate ParaView functionality. You can make use of your own.m files as well. My question is: How do I create a "standardized interface"? How do I "write my own callable objects"? How do I "make use of my own.m files"? A: I have finally found the information. The main thing to understand is that I should use a Matlab routine (that is actually a.m file that calls Paraview routines inside of it). That way, you have a regular Matlab routine that takes a command-line argument. Furthermore, you can use the.m file inside of
