They're responsible for our "big picture" - all the big events, like wars and revolutions. But the little events that happen every day — like fighting over the dishes and unread emails — are also critical to a body's health, health writer Dr. Robert Heinlein said. "If you're running a marathon and there's an obstacle on the course, you may have to stop and fight it out," Heinlein said. "But if there's a mini-crisis in your house, and it's just about to boil over, you don't have to stop and fight." He added, "If every relationship we have could be treated that way, we'd have a better life." "In my work, as well as reading personal accounts from people who've stopped fighting, I see it all the time in the little things that are happening," he said. "For example, someone might come into an office or stay at an appointment and they're happy to see the person — and the next day they're not. "That could be a leftover tension of the previous day, but it could also be a more important issue," he said. Heinlein said the best way to stop the fighting is to begin with a change in attitude. That includes choosing to leave the dish in the sink. "And if you leave it in the sink, you don't have to fight about it," he said. So he'd like to remind readers to take these eight steps to address even the most seemingly minor issues in their everyday lives. The eight steps he discussed are: Declare peace. Open with a "Hi" and "Hello" or even a "Thank you." Accept and respect everyone's differences. Don't judge, only listen. Express gratitude. Be grateful. Leave
