In the electrophotographic printing or copying process, an electrostatic image is formed on an image-bearing member (photoconductive member). The electrostatic image is developed to form a toner image. The toner image is generally transferred to a recording medium such as plain paper by using an electrostatic transfer method, a magnetic transfer method or the like. Recently, digital printing technology has been proposed in which an image is formed on a recording medium using a digital ink containing toner particles which are an electrostatically charged material. The digital ink is supplied to the surface of the image-bearing member (photoconductor), and the image is directly formed thereon using an electrophotographic image-forming process. Digital printing technology offers numerous advantages including elimination of the need for color separation and image-processing steps. Of the many different digital printing technologies, on-demand printing technology is attracting much attention. According to the on-demand printing technology, an image-bearing member is illuminated using an illuminating device such as a laser beam to form an electrostatic latent image on the image-bearing member, and the latent image is developed using a toner of a developer as described above. The developed image can then be directly transferred to paper by an electrostatic transfer method, a magnetic transfer method or the like. After the image has been transferred to paper, the sheet-type recording medium can be delivered to a fuser, and the toner image on the recording medium can then be fixed (i.e., the image can be permanently fixed to the recording medium). Typically, the image-
